Monitoring the partitioning and bioaccumulation of perfluoroalkyl substances in mussels from a heavily industrialized river. Perfluoroalkyl and polyfluoroalkyl substances (PFASs) have been shown to be more bioaccumulative and persistent than conventional pollutants, and their widespread occurrence in aquatic environments coupled with their persistence and long-range transport raises serious concerns about their potential adverse effects on human and animal health and the environment. Despite their persistence and toxicity, little is known about their bioaccumulation and bio-transport in the environment. In this study, a method based on fast liquid-liquid extraction followed by gas chromatography/mass spectrometry (GC-MS) was developed for the simultaneous determination of ten perfluoroalkyl substances (PFASs) in mussels. In addition, a water-based bioconcentration factor (BCF) approach was employed for the first time to examine the partitioning and bioaccumulation of PFASs between mussels and aquatic organisms. Mussels were collected from a heavily industrialized river, a pathway for the rapid transport and long-range transport of both hydrophobic organic and inorganic pollutants. Results showed that there was significant bioconcentration of PFASs in mussels. Among the ten PFASs, perfluorooctane sulfonate (PFOS) was the most bioaccumulated compound. This study demonstrated that PFASs were bioaccumulated and bio-transported along the river in the environment. This study also provided the first evidence of bioaccumulation of PFASs in terrestrial organisms.
