I trust many of you have heard this song although with slightly.Q: Use a single executable to produce different combination of files? I have a set of input data files and a.py script that manipulates them. For example: inputs = "a, b, c" my_script.py: def do_things(words): for x in words: do_things() I would like to produce different combinations of files (out files, each containing a different set of files) by running the.py script on an input of various word combinations. The number of possible combinations is quite large, but I would like to be able to run something like: python my_script.py inputs_1, inputs_2, inputs_3 and the script would automatically produce output files matching the filename of the input data files. If the following is a way to do what I want: in_words = "inputs_1, inputs_2, inputs_3" def do_things(words): for x in words: do_things() The only thing I need to change is the input, and it's easier to manipulate the input. A: You could do it by using os.listdir to get all the files into a list and loop over those: import os def generate_script(inputs): # Create a list of the filenames of all input files inp_files = os.listdir(os.path.dirname(inputs 79a2804d6b
